Chair: Margaret Schabas, University of British Columbia

Speaker: Timothy Brook, University of British Columbia

Price data have been treated as the nuts and bolts of economic history for a century. They are, but in my research on China in the fifteenth to seventeenth centuries, I have determined that grain prices can also be treated as proxies for climate history. This presentation will demonstrate that discovery, and ask how Chinese at the time reflected on these data.

New from History of Political Economy

New Historical Perspectives on Women and Economics

A supplement to
History of Political Economy (vol. 54)

Cléo Chassonnery-Zaigouche, Evelyn L. Forget, and John Singleton, issue editors

The articles in this special issue cover the history of women in the economics profession, a largely male-dominated academic field. Contributors explore the many ways in which women have contributed to economics, particularly the careers that women have made (or not made) while confronting discouragement and discrimination. By placing the status and role of these women in historical contexts, the authors seek to enrich our understanding of economics in the twentieth century.
